Views of New Brunswick

JAMES HANNAY
L. L. D.

THE contemplation of beautiful scenery is always a cause of pleasure to the mind, and there is no scenery more worthy of admiration than that which is displayed in the pages of this little volume. It is true that we have not in New Brunswick the lofty mountains and grand prospects that are to be found in some other portions of the Dominion, but we have, what is far better, pleasing vistas of fertile valleys, rolling hills covered with verdure, beautiful rivers and lovely glens, through which flow running brooks. We have also admirable facilities for sport, whether in the pursuit of large game, water fowl, the birds of the forest, or the trout and salmon of our rivers, lakes and streams. We believe that the majority of people will greatly prefer the scenery of New Brunswick to that which is to be found in more mountainous regions.

The nearness of this country to the great centers of population, and the ease with which it is reached, also make it doubly attractive. Here we have in this volume views of some of the most pleasing prospects which the province contains.

At Sussex the visitor will see a farming country which is not surpassed by any portion of upland territory in America. At Hampton he will behold even a more pleasing prospect, for the scenery there is bolder, and nothing can be sweeter than the lovely valley through which the Kennebecasis River flows. At Rothesay he will see this same river swollen out to the dimensions of a great lake or bay, the favorite resort of the yachtsmen of St. John. At Rothesay, too, he will observe the homes of many of St. John's most affluent citizens. Of St. John it need only be said that from the enterprise of its people, and the vigor with which they pursue any object which they have in view, it is rapidly becoming the great winter port of Canada, and it is likely soon to double and treble its population. From St. John the visitor will naturally go up the St. John River and behold the beautiful scenery upon its banks. This river has sometimes been designated the "Rhine of America", but it is far more beautiful than that famous European river. His journey will end at Fredericton, the capital of New Brunswick, and one of the most charming cities in America, it being specially famous for its fine trees. There he will see also the Parliament Buildings and other structures connected with the government, and he will be pleased with the signs of prosperity which are everywhere apparent.

The stranger who makes this journey will return to his own land with a better opinion than he ever before had of the beauties of New Brunswick.
